THE POLL TAX

The Poll tax has long been a controversial issue in the United States Congress. Efforts by liberals in both parties have attempted to abolish the poll tax for many years.

This year, two senators, have attempted to do away with the poll tax, one a southern senator and another a northern senator. Senator Jacob Javits, Republican, N. Y., attempted to do away with the poll tax by simply passing a bill in both houses of Congress banning the poll tax. He wanted to proceed as quickly as possible, assuming the risk of the bill being unenforceable.

Senator Shepard Holland, a Democrat from Florida, proposed another method, which was in the form of a constitutional amendment to do away with the poll tax. Under Senator Holland's amendment, both the houses of the United States Congress would have to pass the measure, by a two-thirds vote. If both of these houses passed the amendment by that vote, then three-fourth of the states' legislatures must ratify it before it becomes law. Admittedly, this would take approximately three years or more.

The results of the poll tax measure mean very little in the course of the history of the United States. However, the principals involved mean a great deal.

ECONOMIC GROWTH AND POPULATION

An interesting pamphlet has been issued by the Non-Profit Center for International Economic Growth, written by Josephy Marion Jones.

According to Mr. Jones' theory, too rapid an increase in a population results in poverty. Mr. Jones believes that a country needs to save and invest each year three per cent of its national income in order to maintain per capita income at the same level, if the population is expanding by one per cent a year. If the population increase is three per cent a year, it would be necessary to save nine per cent of the national income just to maintain per capita income at the same level.

Mr. Jones points out, however, that while the overall trend for the United States is satisfactory, there may be contrary short term stands. In comparing the population of the United States as of July 1, 1961, with that of 1950, it is evident that there is a lag in the age group from which the greatest buying activity may be expected for several years to come.

In the age groups up to fourteen years, the population is far larger than it was — it is up to forty-two per cent. In the age group of fifteen to seventeen, it is up thirty-one per cent. At the same time, in the group who are from twenty to thirty-nine years and who account for a large portion of all purchases, the change is insignificant, or less than one per cent.

He feels that this is the reason why important statistics reflecting the 1961-1962 recovery from the recession show little or no improvements from the best levels of the 1960's. And for the same reason, he feels that there is little possibility of our economic system reaching new heights for the next several years. By the mid 1960's however, he feels that the great board of youngsters who account for the population gains of recent years, when they begin to form families, our economic system will experience sharp new stimulus from the population factors.

MY GRAND OLD AGE

How do I know that my youth is spent?
Because my get-up-and-go has got-up-and-went.
But in spite of all that, I am able to grin,
When I think of where my get-up-and-go has been.
Old age is golden, I've heard it said,
But sometimes I wonder as I go to bed.
My ears in a drawer, my teeth in a cup,
My eyes on the table until I get up,
Is there anything else I should lay on the shelf?
But I'm happy to know as I close my door,
My friends are the same as in days of yore.
When I was a young my slippers were red,
I could kick my heels right over my head.
When I got older my shoes were blue,
Still I could dance the whole night through.
Now that I'm old, my slippers are black,
I walk to the corner and puff my way back.
Since I've retired from life's competition
I busy myself with complete repetition.
I get up in the morning, dust off my wits,
Pick up the paper and read the "obits."
If my name is missing, then I know I'm not dead,
So I eat a good breakfast and go back to bed.

TOMATO EARLY BLIGHT CAN BE CONTROLLED

Early blight on tomatoes - - a common woe in Virginia's home gardens — can be controlled, says S. B. Fenne, plant pathologist at Virginia Polytechnic Institute.

The disease affects the seedlings, leaves, stems and sometimes the fruit. On older plants the first symptoms appear as small, irregular, brown, dead spots on leaves. The spots enlarge up to one-half inch in width and commonly show rings in a target pattern. The leaves often are killed by the last part of the season.

When early blight affects fruit stems, it can cause the blooms to drop and loss of young fruit. On older fruit it causes dark, leathery sunken spots where the fruit is attached to the stem.

To control early blight, start spraying or dusting when the tomatoes are about the size of chicken eggs. Use a maneb spray (70 per cent wettable powder), or zineb, at 7 to 10 days intervals, depending on the weather. If you prefer dusting, use a 6.5 per cent material. Dusts, however, are not as effective as sprays.

LESS FARM LABOR USED

Just as old Dobbin stepped aside for tractors before World War II, larger tractors have displaced smaller units since the war.

The U. S. Department of Agriculture says that primarily because of these two changes, farm labor used for crop production has decreased more than 60 percent in the past 40 years. Today only one-fifth as much time is needed to produce a bushel of corn as was needed in 1920.
